Flexible Work and Remote Working

Flexible working is available to external workers where the assignment allows it. Both the hiring manager and, for contingent workers, the agency need to agree.

What we support

- Remote working — working from home, full time or part time
- Hybrid — a set pattern of days on site and days at home
- Flexible hours — shifting the working day earlier or later
- Compressed weeks — the same hours over fewer days

Contingent workers. Agree the arrangement before the assignment starts, and record the location and pattern on the request so it is in Beeline from day one. The worker's agency needs to know, because their employment terms have to match. A worker who is fully remote must have their state recorded accurately — it determines their overtime and break entitlements, and Beeline applies the rules from that field.

Hours are still counted week by week. Nothing is banked: a contingent worker who does 45 hours one week and 35 the next is owed overtime for the first week, and a compressed week does not change that. In California and Colorado, compressing a week into longer days triggers daily overtime — check Overtime, Double Time and Comp Time before agreeing one.

Contractors. Where and when they work is generally up to them; that is part of what makes them contractors. Do not impose a working pattern on a contractor. If you need someone present on particular days at particular times, that is a Track 1 arrangement, not a Track 2 one.

Equipment and setup. We provide the same equipment we would for on-site work. We do not provide home office furniture, broadband, or an allowance — those come from the worker's own employer if at all.

Changing an arrangement. Update it in Beeline against the assignment. A move between states matters more than it looks: tell HR, because break and overtime rules change with it, and we may not operate in the new state at all.

Ending an arrangement. The hiring manager can change or withdraw a flexible arrangement where the work needs it, with reasonable notice. Where the arrangement exists as a disability accommodation, talk to HR first — see Disability Accommodations.

Working From Outside the United States

External workers may not work from outside the United States. This applies to both tracks and there is no informal version of it.

What this means in practice. Someone travelling abroad — a holiday, a family visit, anything — does not take their Helvia laptop and log on. Not for an hour, not to clear their inbox, not to join one call. If they are outside the country, they are not working.

Why we are strict about this. Someone working in another country, even briefly, can create a tax presence for Helvia there, can breach the terms of their own right to work, can trigger local employment obligations we know nothing about, and takes our data somewhere our security arrangements do not reach. For a company our size, sorting out any one of these costs far more than the work was worth.

The one exception: short business travel. Where we need a contingent worker to travel abroad for our business, that is allowed if we initiate it, the worker and the agency agree, and it lasts no more than 10 business days. That is a trip we asked for, not someone choosing to work from elsewhere. Talk to HR early — it needs lead time.

If someone asks, the answer is no, and it is worth explaining why rather than just refusing. Most people asking have no idea there is a tax dimension to it.

If you discover someone has been doing it, tell HR the same day. Do not wait to see if it matters. It is usually straightforward to resolve when caught quickly and considerably less so after several months.

Contractors. A contractor based abroad delivering work from their own country is a different arrangement entirely, and sometimes a perfectly good one — but it needs setting up properly, with the right contract and tax treatment. That goes through HR before anything is agreed. What is not acceptable is a US-based contractor quietly relocating mid-engagement.

Relocation. If an external worker tells you they are moving — to another state or another country — tell HR before agreeing anything. Another state changes their break and overtime entitlements; another country usually ends the assignment.
